Site helps clear fog over blogs

If you are lost in the high-tech digital world, check out the new blog offered by Oklahoma City-based Phase 2 Interactive.

Written by Shane Kempton, information architect, the blog is offered to help business leaders better understand and use it effectively to grow their businesses, the company said in an electronic newsletter called the "Bit Bucket."

In the most recent entry, Kempton looks at the zany password rules that IT professionals at government agencies require of their users. Kempton concludes the rules require such incomprehensible passwords that most users of government computers simply write them down on the sheet of paper. Perhaps they use a Post-It note stuck to the computer screen to make stealing it even easier.

Kempton's blog, Tech Buzz, is found at blog phase2online.com.
